

mail the high honors of the pack so that he might observe to whom they were dealt.

During the scandal which followed this discovery, a top who had never been admitted to his acquaintance drew out, "I would leave my card at his house, but I fear he would mark it."

"That would depend," remarked a gentleman present, "on whether he considered it a high honor."

De Ros did not long survive the disgraceful exposure, and Theodore Hook is said to have embalmed his memory in the following punning epitaph:—

"Here lies the premier baron of England patiently awaiting the last trump."

Lord Lytton was extremely fond of whist and belonged to the well-known Portland Club, in which were also found many celebrated players. There was one member of the club, a very harmless, inoffensive man of the name of Townsend, for whom Lytton entertained a peculiar antipathy, and would never play while that gentleman was in the room. He firmly believed that Townsend brought him bad luck.

One afternoon when Lord Lytton was playing and had enjoyed an uninterrupted run of luck, it suddenly turned, upon which he exclaimed, "I am sure that Mr. Townsend has come into the club."

Some two minutes after, just time enough to ascend the stairs, in walked this unlucky personage. Lord Lytton left the table as soon as the rubber was over, and did not renew the play.

Swift alludes to whist as a favorite pastime, and Haywood tells us that about the beginning of the century there was in a country town in Somersetshire a whist club, that met for play every Sunday evening in the back parlor of a barber's shop.

On one occasion, when four members of this club were sitting at the table, a funeral of a brother, some delay occurred from the grave not being ready, and the coffin was set down. By way of while away the time one of them produced a pack of cards from his pocket and proposed a rubber. The rest gladly assented, and they were deep in the game, using the coffin as a table, when the sexton came to, announce that everything was ready.

Goldsmith somewhere tells of an old lady who, lying sick into death, played cards with the curate to pass away the time, and after winning all his money had just proposed to play for her funeral expenses when she expired.

Mozart also played cards on his death-bed, and while he was so weak, he had to have some one to hold the cards for him.

When Cavour sat down to his first game of 'double dummy' he lost a large sum to a member of the Paris Club. He paid the money with the best grace imaginable, and merely remarked that he thought he saw through the game and that it might not be such a bad investment after all. The next night he met the same antagonist, played hard and steadily for several hours and rose from the table a richer man by $1,000.

Still larger were the winnings of Espartaco from his foe Maroto, if the truth is told about them. The story runs that they agreed to meet privately in a lone farm-house at Benigana to arrange a truce between their respective forces. No sooner did Espartaco enter the room than the Carlist chief challenged him to a game of traville, a challenge the Carlist commander accepted with alacrity. Espartaco first won all Maroto's money, then his own conditions for a truce by article by article, and finally the entire submission of the Carlist army. Within twenty-four hours Maroto had paid the debt, and the first Carlist war was at an end.

A traveller in New Zealand, spending the night in a squatter's hut, was invited to cut in for a rubber of whist. As he took his seat he inquired "what's points?" "Why," said his partner, in a stone indicating surprise at such a question, "the usual game, of course—sheep points and a bullock on the rubber."

Perhaps the most remarkable wager ever made was brought to light in an investigation which took place in Bow Street in 1815. The police officer reported that he had seen two men on a wall on Hampstead road, one of them hanging by the neck from a lamp post, having just been tied up by the other. It came out that they had played all day, first for money, then for clothes, and finally, which of the two should hang the other. The larger man of the two lost, and was actually paying the penalty when the police officer intervened and saved his life.

Anent Lord Granville's devotion to whist, there is the following well-authenticated story:— One afternoon, intending to set out for Paris, he ordered the carriage at Graham's at 11. When it came around he was playing whist. At 12 o'clock he sent out to say that he should not be ready for an hour or two yet, and that the horses had better be changed. Again six hours went by and the coachman appearing was ordered to change them again. Three times at intervals of six hours were fresh horses put in before he was ready to start. When the party rose they were up to their ankles in cards, and the Ambassador, it was reported, was the loser to the tune of £3,000 or £4,000.

But a still longer sitting at the card-table was that in which Governor Stokes of North Carolina and Mountjoy Bailey, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, were two of the players. They sat down to cards on Thursday evening, played all that night and the next day, only stopping occasionally for refreshments. The game was continued Friday night and Saturday, through Saturday night and all day Sunday and Sunday night, the players resting for a snatch of sleep as nature became exhausted. Monday morning the game was in full bloom, but at 10 o'clock Bailey moved an adjournment, alleging that his official duties required his presence at the Senate chamber. Stokes remonstrated, but the Sergeant-at-Arms persisted and rose from the table.

The Governor grumbled and scolded, but finally gave it up, swearing that if he had suspected that Bailey would break up the game, thus prematurely he would have "seen" him—so to speak—before he would have invited him to join the party.

One evening when Washington Irving, Everett and Bancroft were chatting over diplomatic reminiscences, Everett told how when he and the Neapolitan Ambassador had been presented to Queen Victoria, Lord Melbourne intimated that they would be expected to join in a game of whist with the Duchess of Kent.

"I play but a very poor game myself," said Melbourne, "in fact, I scarcely understand it." "And I," said the Neapolitan to Everett, "am a very bad player, and should I chance to be your partner I invoke your forbearance in advance," to which the American Envoy replied that he knew very little of the game himself.

"Here," said Everett, in relating it, "were three dignified persons, clad in gorgeous attire, solemnly going to play a game they imperfectly understood, and for which none of them cared a straw."

Upon reaching the Duchess' apartments the Ambassadors were formally presented, and then, at her invitation, sat down to play. As soon as the cards were dealt a lady—awaiting placed herself at the back of the Duchess, and the latter said: "Your Excellencies will excuse me if I rely on the advice of my friend here, for I must confess that I am really a very poor player."

This was almost too much for Everett's gravity, and it was only with the greatest effort that he could refrain from laughing aloud at the lady's familiarity of the situation.

When Lord Thanes was imprisoned in the tower for the O'Connell riot three of his friends, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke de Laval and Captain Smith, were admitted to play whist with him, and remain till the lock-up hour at 11.

Early in the sitting Captain Smith fell back in a fit of apoplexy, and one of the party rose to call for help.

"Stop!" cried another, "we shall be turned out if you make a noise; let our friend alone till 11, we can play dummy and he'll be none the worse, for I can read death in his face."

Shortly after the close of the Session War General Forrest and his wife stopped at a hotel in Memphis, and after examining their purses found the sum total of their wealth amounted to $7.50. The General being due that evening at a house where he knew a rubber was to be played, proposed that he should tempt fortune to the full extent of his means, and asked his wife to play for his success. She would not promise, but he felt that she was for him, and knew how it would be. But let him tell the rest in his own words:—

"They had tables—one was a quarter-dollar table, one a half, and one a dollar and a half. I wanted to make my $7 last as long as I could, so I sat down to the quarter table. By dinner-time I had won enough to do better, and after we had eaten, sat down to the dollar and a half table. Sometimes I won, and then again I'd lose, until high upon midnight, when I had better luck. I knew Mary was sitting up anxious, and it made me cool.

"I set my hat upon the floor, and every time I won I'd drop the money in the hat. I sat there until day broke, and then I took my hat in both hands, smashed it on my head and went home.

"When I got to my room, there sat Mary in her gown. She seemed tired and worried, and though she looked mighty hard at me, she didn't say a word. I walked right up to her, and emptied my hat right into the lap of her gown, and then we counted it. Just $1,500 even, and that gave me a start."

Happening to drop into a Continental casino one day Robert Houde observed a Greek reaping a rich harvest at carte, and as soon as a seat became vacant he took it. The Greek, dealing dexterously, turned a king from the bottom of the pack. When the deal came to Houde he observed:—

"When I turn kings from the bottom of the pack I always do it with one hand instead of two, as it is more effective, and much more elegant. See! here comes his majesty of diamonds," and up came the card.

"The cheat stared at the concolor for a moment, and then rushed from the place wishing to possess himself of his hat, coat or winnings.

Another of the light-fingered fraternity, after winning ten games at carte in succession tried his fortune against a new opponent, and continued to win. He had made four points, and dealing, turned up a king and won.

"My luck is something wonderful," he replied. "You said his adversary," and all the more wonderful since I have the four kings of the pack in my pocket," and the professor of carte declared him to be the table.

There is a good story told of the outwitting of a gambler and a confederate, who was looking on, by an apparent innocent. The game, which was Napoleon, is played in this manner: Five cards are dealt and the players in turn declare the number of tricks each claims to make. Whoever declares the highest number plays against the rest, and the first one led is trumps.

There were in this case only two players, and to the "honest" was dealt ace, king, queen, knave of clubs and ace of diamonds. He naturally backed himself to get five tricks, the chances in favor of this doing so being enormous.

He intended, of course, to make clubs trumps, but the readiness with which his wagers were accepted by the onlooker who saw his opponent's hand, aroused his suspicions, and when the stake had risen to a high amount, he made his solitary diamond trump, and found his adversary with five clubs, and so made every trick.

A Mr. Parry of New York, as the end of his backache drew along, let his old cronies know that he intended to give up card-playing as soon as he was married. On learning this they put their heads together, and a day or two after the wedding invited him to a little dinner at Delmonico's, at which he was to receive a $30 silver service.

Dinner done and the presentation made, the party made themselves and their guest merry over some excellent wine, and when they thought the time had come proposed a game of poker, and Parry gave in, "just for this once."

His host had fixed things nicely, and calculated upon winning the price of their wedding gift, the dinner and the wine. When, long after daylight the next morning, the game broke up, the intended victim not only held possession of the silver service, but had completely cleaned out every one of his opponents.

A gentleman who has travelled in Russia relates the following:—

"I remember once when playing carte at a ball given by the Empress to the late Emperor, the Emperor, who was standing about, came behind me to watch the game. My adversary and I were both at four, and it was my deal.

"Now," said the Emperor, "let us see whether you can turn up a king."

"I dealt and then held up the turn-up card, observing, 'Your orders, sir, have been obeyed.'"

"The Emperor was greatly astonished, and a dozen times afterward asked me how I managed it, and he never would believe that it was a mere hazard—that I had taken the chance of the card being a king."

NEWS AND GOSSIP.

Hampden now has a cab company. Yellow fever is increasing in Brazil. A telephone is attached to a buoy at Bordeaux. A London cathedral will be lighted by electricity.

An International Labor Congress will be held at Paris in August. The Pope is deluged with written requests to reinstate Dr. McGlynn.

Russia's warlike movements are causing grave concern to Austria and Germany. A crematorium is to be erected at Heidelberg. It will be the second one in Germany.

M. Blaise, a Paris journalist, has charged M. Breyfuss, another journalist, with attempting blackmail at Monte Carlo.

Electric force is now used for rolling barrels, pumping, etc., in the champagne cellars, where the use of great iron mallets was formerly resorted to. Professor Koch's portrait has been printed on cotton handkerchiefs, which are advertised to be "good for nasal catarrh," and sell rapidly in Berlin.

The hotels of Berlin have been rendered unhealthy by the consumptives who visited that city to try the Koch lymph. These patients ought to have gone to a hospital.

Aquatics instituted by the British Foreign Office regarding peasant proprietorship in Europe give some interesting results. A period of forty years is covered. Everywhere there is an increasing desire to purchase land. This is shown remarkably in France.

The National Cat Club of England, which was established several years ago to encourage the breeding of good cats, reports progress. The cat club "stud book" is rapidly filling, and hence the improvement of cats throughout the United Kingdom is steady and general.

Yellow fever has broken out near Lyons. At Lyons it is believed that a young newly
